Confronting the Shadow: The Hero's Journey in Borges' 'El Etnógrafo'

William Rowlandson

Abstract

This article focuses on 'El Etnógrafo' ('The Anthropologist' [El Glorioso etnógrafo], a brief and descriptively-anthropological fiction from Borges' El libro de los cabaleros [1975] [The Book of Knights 1975]). The tale's protagonist, Fred Mordock, undergoes a profound transformation while conducting anthropological field research in the North American prairie, centered on his separation from his home and his dialogue with the ritual medicine man. In particular, under the guidance of the medicine man, Mordock learns to focus on and account his death. This brief narrative may be appraised and amplified as emblematic characterizations of the hero's journey, as examined by Carl Jung, and as depicted by Joseph Campbell. In this perspective, Mordock accepts the call to adventure, engages in symbolic struggles, experiences a deep and transformative break with the human, and returns home empowered with deeper wisdom. In this article, I concentrate on the purity of the hero's journey as depicted both in 'El Etnógrafo' and in other tales of Borges, evaluating the particular healing dimension of the synchronism with the personal and collective shadow, the relationship with the anima form-figure of the medicine man, and the transition to the language of dreams. I consider, consequently, the nature of psychic healing as processed both within the narrative – Mordock's journey – and outside the narrative – the reader's journey, as twin epistemological determinations. This article constitutes part of a larger project that evaluates the relationship between Borges' aesthetic ideas and Jung's psychological writings, their shared attention to mysticism and to the role of dreams, myths, narratives, creativity and active imagination, healing and the process of individuation.

Borges' later fictions have received far less critical attention than his well-known publications of Ficciones (1944) and El Aleph (1949). Bell-Villada (1999), for example, dismisses El Informe de Brodie as 'rather slight', suggesting that 'Because none of the material in Dr. Brodie's Report even approaches the level of the Ficciones or the stories in El Aleph, there is little reason to discuss any one piece in detail' (200).
